After breakfast he left the house, and the family thought, of course, he had gone back to his work. Instead, however, he went to the store of Mr. Charles Leonard and there purchased a 33-calibre Harrington & Richardson revolver and a dozen cartridges. He returned quietly to his room, withdrew his clothing and lay upon his bed. He placed the weapon with careful aim upon his bosom so that the ball would benetrate his heart. He fired. The discharge was a deadly one, the aim being accurate, and the leaden bullet passing through his heart. He must have died without the slightest agony, for his bed and body showed no signs of struggling. When the members of Mr. Hoy's family reached the room their friend had ceased breathing.

The coroner was promptly notified, but deemed an inquest unnecessary. HAD BEEN UNWELL.
